Three-fourths of them took their coats off to fight the heat. It was a warm and enthusiastic crowd. All eyes were turned toward the stage in the center of the rink. In one corner of it stood a huge floral harp, with a pair of white kid boxing gloves peacefully reposing upon its strings, and the inscription,

"To John L. Sullivan." A bright-eyed Japanese hung on to the ropes with a towel over his shoulder and a pitcher of water at his feet. A man weighing 200 pounds stood in the center of the stage, stripped to the waist. His body was as round as the trunk of a tree. When he bowed to the howling mob of admirers the smooth muscles slid over and under one another like the coils of a great snake twisted around the tree trunk.
